Introduction: "I think the hardest lesson for me to learn – and I have not learned it, one attempts to learn it every day- is that the word 'woman' is not after all something for which one can find a literal referent without looking into the looking glass."

Gayatri c spiwak, The Post-Colonial Critic.

This paper is an attempt to study a single 'woman', whom the society often treated as mysterious and she is no one other than Kamala Das. Every person lives with a mask on their face. Throughout their entire life only in some particular moments they make their real face visible. But in case of writers this mask play is a bit complicated one. This is because the real personality often merges with the unreal world they create and as a result the readers get confused that what they are reading is autobiographical or fiction. Things got worse in case of women writers because there is a general tendency among readers from the olden times onwards that is connecting the personal life of women writers with their works and assuming what all things they have written is autobiographical. In reality, the women writers were often struggling with their problematic 'home' and problematic 'society'. As a mode of escape from the societal stoning they started writing with an indirect persona and the result was creating a literary 'other'. The choice of Indian women's writing in English was deliberate. Women writers including Kamala Das learned English during the colonial and post-colonial periods and they found it more comfortable in writing in English than in their native language because of the acceptance and global value of English.

Kamala Das's English writing was much different from her contemporary writers. She never copied the style of writing of native English authors and she used a kind of 'Indianized' English. Before that Indian English was not taken seriously. A women writer is often confused about what to write because a free flow of ink is not allowed to her. Before writing anything she has to censor and re-censor it in mind because she always fears what the society may think about her when writes honestly. So she always searches for something safe to write, for example about weddings, religious ceremonies childbirth, deathbed etc. All these are events which happen inside the security of home which she is having more connection than a male writer. Kamala Das also wrote about these kind of domestic stories than dealing with the complicated world issues. But she differs from her contemporaries only because of her fearless honest writing. Most women writers lack courage to write about private life especially about sexual encounters. A few women writers talk about body or body expressions. It is amazing to note that the physical dimensions are systematically eliminated from their works. For example in almost all works children are born but sexual union is never described, family feuds occur without bloodshed. It is the middle class morality which stresses women not to write about their own body. When compared to olden times present women writers are bold enough to focus on their own bodies.

Autobiography is etymologically and in practice the story of a person's life, meant to be shared with others. Broken down, the word auto/ bio/ graphy which means self/ life/ story, the narrative of the events of a person's life. Autobiographies are not regarded as a literary genre before eighteenth century because of so many reasons. The first critical controversy was that the division between fact and fiction and it is interesting to note that in 21st century also critics haven't found out an authentic solution for this controversy. Readers also are on different opinions about autobiographers and some people take it as a factual document and some others view it as much more closely connected with fiction.” Everyone knows what an autobiography is but no two observers, no matter how assured they may be, are in agreement”. (Olney 1972, p 7).

This statement goes to the problem of defining autobiography. In olden times autobiographies are considered as history text because autobiographers mirror the history and culture of its subject. Actually autobiography is interplay between the past and the present. An autobiographer writes about what all things happened in his/her life and on what situation he/she is experiencing now, that is at their present. Truth in autobiography is a very complex question. The autobiographers present truth as seen from inside so it is more subjective than objective. It is not a fault at all. Kamala Das turned to be a controversy queen after publishing her ground breaking autobiography My Story in 1989. The admission of intense feeling of hate, sexual encounter, love and fear, painful psychological experiences are something about which autobiographers are generally silent. Here turns Kamala Das as a unique case among autobiographer's because she had pulled out everything out under the carpet which some body has kept safe. It is hard to write, it is more hard when the writer is a woman and it is harder when she starts writing the truth or revealing the self. After the world war II, two bibliographies of autobiographies were published on both British and American. But it is important to note that no womenwriters were included in that text. Autobiographies written by women are treated as sentimental chronicles and what all things they are writing is either 'made-up' stories or non-sense. "..... a book? NO, it is the personal outpouring of a disturbed lady - albeit genius - whose eclectic life is of no more interest to her than to the reader. There is no story line, no plot, no continuity. Her writing is frantic stringing together of words without any thought for the ordinary arrangement of noun and verb, it is hard reading..... it is utter confusion". (Alhearn 1974:17).

Saradakutty, famous Malayalam critic is of the opinion that Kamala Das' My Story is the consequence of her reading My Life, Isadora Duncan's autobiography. She was much influenced by the liberated U.S dancer who rejected the conventions of classical ballet. (Saradakutty, Mathrubhumi weekly, March 7-2007). My Story had its origin in a hospitalized condition of the author for a serious heart disease. It is even commented that the work was begin to "distract her mind from the fear of sudden death as well as to clear her outstanding hospital bills" (Dwivedi p140). Kamala Das bravely fought against all criticism and protests and she courageously disclosed in the preface of the My Story that, "I have written several books in my life-time but none of them provided the pleasure the writing of My Story has given me". It was her childhood in Nalappat house which contributed much to her literary career. Loyalty and affection of servants from different castes, traditional Nair weddings, stories told by her grand -mother, trees and flowers around Nalapat house, dance of eunuchs in streets, religious beliefs, down-trodden women, clever woman who can win the heart of any man, freedom struggle, woman who seeks fulfilment in lesbianism etc are themes which she got from her village.

In almost all societies distinctions based on wealth or status are there and one can alter their wealth or some other status but one cannot step out from the caste which he/she have been born. Now a day a lot of people are publishing their autobiographies especially from the western countries. Many of their autobiographies have nothing particular to convey and they seems like plain tales. Kamala Das life story is bigger, bolder and better understood when we peep into her battered emotional love life. She was born with a dark complexion to unsuitable parents who lived in their own world. Sorrows played an important role in her life from the beginning and it continued when she married at the tender age of 15 to a lustful cousin who unashamedly boasts about his illegal affairs with his cousins and maid servants. Her very first experience with him was very bitter but an innocent girl of 15 doesn't know how to say NO to a man. Early marital knot seems to have given a jolt to her sensibility as a woman. She always craved for a beautiful emotional bond with her husband but his prime importance was for physical love. Love was an obsession to her. When marital love degenerated into lust she was haunted by frustration which later leads her to seek sexual fulfilment in extra-marital relationships with other men. She frankly admits it in this way:

.....you let me toss my youth like coins

Into various hands, you let me mate with shadows,

You let me sing in empty shrines, you let your wife

Seek ecstasy in other's arms.....

Kamala Das, A Man is a Season

The post-colonial Indian women writing in English are more concerned with man-woman relationship than any other issues. Many of these woman writers including Kamala Das portray woman as an individual in search of freedom than an object for sexual pleasure. Kamala Das' poems express the quest for love and frustration in marriage life. VrindaNabar observes: "My story and her responses to my questionnaire suggest that she began seriously writing verse because of her intense unhappiness in her marriage". (The Endless Female Hunger, p 39) Kamala Das' life has been written talked and gossiped about, there's nothing left to be said but still turns to be the favourite for the critics. There was a girl inside her, a wife, mother and a lover who always longed for love. During her childhood for her ammamma's attention she obeyed what all things that old village lady told her. After marriage she adjusted with the likes of her husband. She played with her kids like being one among them. The only reward which she expected from all those people was nothing other than love. She says: "I always wanted love, and if you don't get it within your home, you stray a little." (Kamala Das, Interview with Warrior)

Conclusion: One of the significant features of Kamala Das' autobiography is her instable feelings. While reading one page the reader may feel that her husband is a womanizer and she hates him, another section may be a dedication to her loving husband which mentions him as her 'darling'. She rapidly shifts her emotions and feelings and thereby surprises the reader. She says her autobiography is an authentic one, later she disagrees with the statement and proves with reasons that there is something fabricated in My Story. Instability in speaking and writing is the fact that one researcher finds out while working on Kamala Das. And this is one of the main reasons why researchers and readers follow her and her works after her death also.
